Pattinson respects the art of filmmaking and his devotion to it is admirable. He has an unhealthy obsession with method acting. While filming Good Time in the streets of New York, he was so into his character that no one in public recognised him. Another example of his devotion to character is from his Twilight days. Apparently, Pattinson was close to getting fired from the franchise for “not smiling enough” during interviews and stuff. Even off-camera, he was in the husk of the lonely and edgy vampire.

In his 2019 psychological horror film, The Lighthouse, he gave another outstanding performance with long goosebump-inducing monologues, mesmerising expressions, apt body language, sailor's accent, tap dancing to sea shanties and even eating mud to get into the character. For which, he again got nominated as the best actor for the Independent Spirit Awards early this year. The point that I am trying to make is that one would not get nominated as the best actor twice, for two separate conflicting genres of movies if they were a bad actor. One would not get picked by an auteur such as Christopher Nolan for his upcoming film TENET if they were a bad actor. And finally, one would not get picked by Matt Reeves to play the role of a legendary icon such as Batman, if they were a bad actor. So if performance is your concern, you have nothing to worry about. Pattinson has got you covered! In the meantime, go check out his work past Twilight! No, seriously, just do it!

MISINTERPRETATION

Batman happens to be a human in peak physical condition. A huge physical stature with bulging muscles and a deep baritone are some of his primary characteristics. Now, Pattinson's body has always been a talking point in this matter. The memes about seeing a skinny Batman on screen have not ended to this day. Recent criticism about him arises from a misinterpreted interview or rather a joke. Historically, Pattinson happens to have a weird, deadbeat sense of humour when it comes to interviews. Back in 2011, during the promotion of his circus drama film Water for Elephants, Pattinson jokingly stated in a talk show that he once saw a clown explode and die in a circus. A week later, he admitted to lying about it just because he did not have anything interesting to say in the interview.

Quite recently, Pattinson did an interview with GQ where he touched upon his preparation for the Batman. In the interview, Pattinson jokingly stated that he is choosing not to work out and that he is refusing to listen to his trainer. As you could guess, the whole internet went crazy. From begging for Pattinson to get replaced to getting him fired, it was an absolute mess. Not just the random clowns but also hack news websites started posting articles on the matter. It honestly baffles me as to how seriously these clowns took Pattinson's statements. Not to mention, it was a casual interview. Somewhat similar to a talk show. And you do not take every statement in a talk show literally. These clowns choose to believe everything they see online without taking it with a pinch of salt and then, start venting about it on social media as if it is one of their therapy sessions. To top that off, Pattinson also talks about his meal plan provided by the Batman folks, which is a clear indication that he was joking and that he is indeed taking the role quite seriously. So basically, all Pattinson intended was to be sarcastic and joke around. But it came out the wrong way. This whole uproar could have been avoided if these clowns read the interview themselves and checked out any of his past interviews to realise that Pattinson says weird stuff all the time.

HYPOCRISY

Most of the Battinson haters are just plain hypocrites. Back when Heath Ledger got cast as the Joker for The Dark Knight, he received similar criticism for being in cheesy romantic movies. Yet now, the same people consider him as the best live-action Joker of all time. He even won an Oscar for Best Supporting Actor. Similarly, Ben Affleck got a ton of hate when he got cast as Batman for doing romantic films in the past. But after seeing his performance, the same clowns adore him. These clowns seem to not realise that calling Pattinson a bad Batman for doing Twilight is tantamount to calling Affleck the same for doing his disastrous Daredevil movie. Robert Pattinson is an Oscar calibre actor and none of these online protests is going to change his casting for The Batman. It is only fitting that the guy who started out as a vampire is now playing a bat. It's almost magical really! 🦇
