Unlocking the corona code

Months into the pandemic, people are continuing to adjust to the new normal, with a whole bunch of behaviors and words emerging from a world that has been turned upside down.

WATCH PARTIES

Because of the shutdown of movie theatres, studios are releasing movies on digital platforms early. Universal is hosting regular watch parties every Saturday, and some of these are actually brand new movies. Users can attend the watch parties on Twitter through hashtags. The Hunt, The Invisible Man and Emma all had watch parties, with commentary from special guests. There was an Avengers: Endgame watch party as well which had the script writers, the Russo Brothers, and Robert Downey Jr in attendance. Fans who attended got plenty of behind the scenes information. Mark Ruffalo and Taika Waititi hosted a watch party for Thor Ragnarok on Instagram, which was a lot of fun as well. James Mangold gave fans new information about Wolverine, with a watch party showcasing Logan, and so did the directors of Into the Spideverse. Before the pandemic, watch parties did take place, but on shady sites with pirated copies and without the legitimacy of being endorsed by the creators of the movie. We are really enjoying this space of quarantine watch parties.

MARBLE RACING

With live sports all but dead because of the pandemic, fans are turning to alternative forms of entertainment, and here the sport of marble racing has come to the rescue. One Youtube channel in particular, Jelle's Marble Runs has some really incredible tracks with videos that have top grade production and excellent commentary. One video follows an F1 race beat by beat, including qualifying runs, controversies on the track when one marble appears to nudge another outside the track, and races held in different locations around the world. There are some shots from the marble's point of view, and even medics who take care of the injured marbles when they go out of the track, so the detailing is fantastic.

INFODEMIC

In the fight against the coronavirus, researchers and healthcare professionals discovered that the lay person had some outrageous misconceptions about the disease, how it spreads, and how they can keep themselves safe. These include myths such as hot weather protecting people, or that consumption of garlic can prevent the spread of the disease. Even officials from the World Health Organisation recognised the problem, that misinformation was spreading faster than the virus. Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus, Director-General of the World Health Organization (WHO) addressed a meeting of security experts in Germany by saying, "We're not just fighting an epidemic; we're fighting an infodemic". The WHO deployed a team of experts who are busting myths on popular social networking channels such as Facebook, YouTube, Instagram and TikTok.

UPPERWEAR

As the world shifted to working from home, the use of video conferencing apps skyrocketed, and the vocabulary particular to the use of such apps followed close behind. One of these new fangled terms is upperwear, which are the only articles of clothing that matter because they are the only ones visible in video conferencing apps. It is about carefully crafting your look but only taking the trouble for the regions that are visible on camera.

OFFICESICK

We have heard of homesickness which is a longing for home, and seasickness, which is getting sick because of the motion of a ship, but what is officesickness? Well, it is a longing for the familiar comforts of the office, including the noise of the industrial air conditioning, the sounds of typewriters clacking away, random extended discussions around the water cooler, and arguments over using separate microwaves for veg and non veg food. If you are missing all these things while working from home, then you are suffering from officesickness. Of course, we at Digit are hoping that our pet mice at work are finding some way to subsist without the leftovers from Swiggy orders, and that the office cat still remembers us when we get back. We have also left behind a whole ton of the latest gadgets, as well as a few board games and a LEGO set. So we are definitely suffering from this ailment. 🐭
