

Lego Technic Lamborghini Sian FKP 37

The latest entrant into Lego's stunning Technic lineup is a 1:8 scale version of the Lamborghini Sian FKP 37. The previous was the gorgeous Bugatti Chiron in 2018.

What makes the Sian special is that it's the Italian carmaker's first production hybrid hypercar which was revealed just last year, at the Frankfurt Motor Show. This also makes it the third model to join Lego Technic's Ultimate series.

The 1:8 scale was worked on by engineers from both Lego and Lamborghini's teams.

The kit itself consists of 3696 pieces. Once put together, the scale model measures 60cm long, 13cm high and 25cm wide. Some of the cool features that carry over from the actual model to the scale model include scissor doors that open, a rear wing that rises and dips, fully decorated interiors and a to-scale V12 engine which is coupled to an eight-speed transmission.

The whole thing is priced at $379.99. Of course, the model it's based on, the Lamborghini Sian FKP 37 costs a whopping $3.7 million, and only 63 of them will be made.

Swarovski Crystal Batmobile

When it comes to crystal, nobody does it better than Swarovski. In the past, they've done plenty of crystal collectibles, from superheroes to characters, and even objects. This time around, they've come up with a crystal replica of the Batmobile. What with it being made with crystal and all, this is definitely not a toy. It is also quite pricey, costing $599.

The batmobile features 473 facets in its design, including the iconic angular wheels. While we did mention that this doesn't come cheap, this actually isn't their cheapest batmobile. While this particular model only measures 6 inches in length, they previously sold a 10 inch batmobile for $11,500 which was decked with, well, crystals. That is their thing after all. The 10 inch one however was limited edition and you can no longer get your hands on these. You can however get your hands on this 6 inch version, which is available on Swarovski's official website.

Bugatti Etiron

No, this is not a car. It is in fact, a coffee machine. A bugatti-inspired coffee machine, from Bugatti, because why not. Don't worry, Bugatti is not going into coffee machine manufacturing. This is a one-off, and a really good looking one at that.

Worked on by designer Fabio Martins, the capsule machine is inspired by the classic Bugatti cars of old, and comes in the same iconic colours of classic blue and black. The shape and design of the coffee machine is also inspired by the same cars, with a horseshoe grille design on the front and the curves and arches on the rear.

The coffee machine is a nespresso capsule machine which uses sealed capsules. The capsules, when inserted into the machine, result in hot water pumping into the injector holes at high pressure, which brew the coffee inside. That's it, it's a regular coffee machine. Only, made by Bugatti. Guess that makes it not-so-regular.
