

Creepiest objects

The subject of the original curator's battle, was to find the creepiest exhibits in collections around the world. <https://digit.in/aug20-95>

Sassiest object

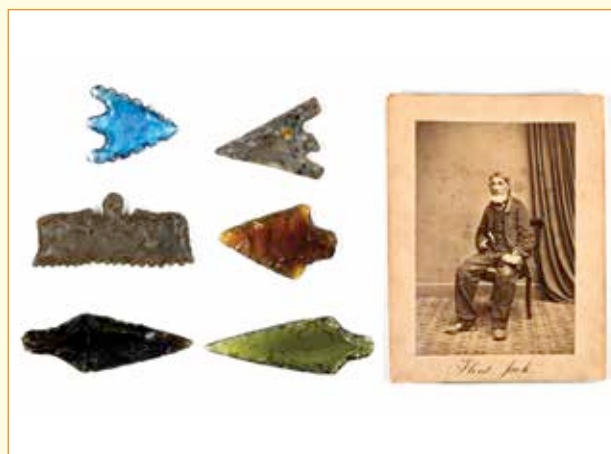

Another theme for a curator's battle - sassiest objects, and the cultures of old did not disappoint. <https://digit.in/aug20-96>

Fantastic fakes

The curator battles on Twitter began with a showcase of the creepiest items in collections, but the closed museums kept the hype going with different themes, like the dubious artefacts shown here.

↑ The Yorkshire Museum showed off their collection of fake historical arrowheads, made from modern materials such as glass bottles. The faker was a Victorian prankster known as Flint Jack, who sold his objects to museums around the world.

← Wakefield Museums and Castles showed off these moulds that were probably used to make counterfeit Roman currency, long after the Roman civilisation had collapsed.

← The National Museums of Scotland had to show this really rare furry stout, which evolved to adapt to the cold temperatures at extreme depths. It keeps their mermaid company.

← The Oshawa Museum has this example of an early Photoshop fail, where a person has been clumsily cut and pasted into a photograph that he did not make it to.

← The Maidstone Museum had this mummified bird that was sold to an unsuspecting Egyptologist. X-ray probes revealed that this priceless artefact was just a bundle of linen.

← The Whipple Museum did not hesitate to admit that there were forgeries in its collection, including this medieval astrolabe that was actually made in the early 20th century.

← This wooden stamp from the Australian War Museum was used in the POW war camps of Nazi Germany, to make it look like the mail was approved by the censors, when they weren't.
