Urban sprawls in Sci-Fi

These books explore the possibilities of what can happen in cities that span continents or planets. <https://digit.in/aug20-104>

Gotham

Best described by Frank Miller when he said "Metropolis is New York in the daytime; Gotham City is New York at night.", despite the efforts of Batman, there are just too many supercriminals continuously harassing the citizens of Gotham. If you are not a thug or belong to the elite, you basically have a hard life here with the system perpetually on the brink of crumbling apart.

Rapture

This is an underwater city that is built with the specific purpose of creating a bubble of paradise, in a world that is populated by "parasites". The entire city is a capitalist's dream come true, without any political intervention, and scrubbed of all religion. This means that there are no public services, and everything, including law enforcement is a subscription service.

London

In the world of Mortal Engines, cities are giant constructions on top of tank treads that roam about the world and eat other cities. In this dystopian future, London is the alpha carnivore on the top of the food chain. Life for citizens here is pretty good, because they are constantly fed with the spoils from this gargantuan beast's healthy diet, which is made up of smaller cities.

Sanctuary

This town has it all, a sidey bar with chatty customers, a murderous doctor, a gloriously stupid mechanic, and a gunshop where you can practice on live targets. Just make sure to avoid Claptrap, especially if it is his birthday. The entire city is built on top of an abandoned vessel of a mining corporation, and after a series of ridiculous events gained the ability to float in the air!

Minas Tirith

One of the most prosperous cities of Middle Earth, it is also well fortified and constructed in seven concentric circles. The inhabitants are isolated from the border skirmishes, with plenty of fresh produce from the Pelennor Fields. There is always a wary military presence though because the enemy is always close. The king is gallivanting around somewhere in the north.

Zion

The inhabitants in the last human holdout on the planet live in perpetual fear of discovery by the machines. On the positive side, their entire existence is not a virtual construct, with lazy and algorithmic names such as "Mega City". At least the party scene, which is literally underground, is appropriately excessive considering everyone is living through an apocalypse.
