

Competitive Bookshelving

Portuguese analysts are making their bookshelves increasingly sophisticated for video calls. <https://digit.in/aug20-97>

It's too thin!

Watch comedian Hoezaay get a disastrous coronacut, but at least it "feels amazing" in the end. <https://digit.in/aug20-98>

Zooming through the pandemic

If there is one thing that is changing the habits the most in the AC (after corona, read last month's Hot or Not for more info) era, it is the videoconferencing apps.

Aditya Madanapalle | aditya@digit.in

INFITS

Just like the upperwear (a term for the section of the wardrobe visible on webcams), there is a new word for clothes that you wear just for video conferencing, and they are called infits, which is like the opposite of outfits. The look can best be described as business on top and party on the bottom. Basically it does not matter what you are wearing below the waist, but if you have still not burned your way through the few games on Houseparty, be sure to wear pants before even installing the app. You can spot an infit in the wild when you see a news anchor working from home who does not understand the full field of view of the camera, and can be seen pairing colourful bermudas with a suit, tie and shirt. Unlike upperwear though, infits can refer to a complete set of clothing... it does not matter if it is unwashed or brand new, as long as it looks good on camera! This is a requirement for the Zoom zumba meets. Other phrases for this phenomenon include the Zoom Suit or the Zoom Look. Interested fashionistas can search for the hashtag #zoommullet on Twitter.

CORONACUT

For some inexplicable reason, zoommullet does not have anything to do with hair, but rather just that how things appear from one side do not tell the whole story. There is however, a word for the traumatic haircuts that people seem to be giving themselves, or even worse, getting from their partners during the lockdown. These are known as coronacuts, and the simplest one is just simply going all hermit and letting the hair grow any which way possible. This has resulted in a few mustachioed ladies who have to resort to wearing masks indoors, but that is not nearly as bad as those poor gents lacking in dihydrotestosterone, who only have a few stray strands snaking out of their otherwise bare chins. The second most simplest hair cut is what is known as the zero degree by the local saloons, which involves simply taking the machine, putting it on the lowest setting, and shaving the entire head. This gives you a nearly bald appearance, but is a quick fix for anyone forced to cut the hair of their partners. Going to the lowest common denominator also helps if a hair cutting operation gets messed up in any other way. To see the coronacut in action, check out the social media feed of comedian Jose Covaco, also known as Hoezaay.

ZOOM ROOMS

One of the most important things about Zoom calls is that you have to make sure that your surroundings are appropriate for an office crowd. This is actually a lot of effort, as you have to make sure stray pyjamas are not visible, there are no messy stacks of newspapers, crumpled up bed sheets, or the leftover pizza from last night's Netflix binge. There is also considerable effort taken to make sure that the lighting is just right, or people will make judgement calls about your living conditions. The best choice are ceiling fitting swivel lights that give you some room to adjust the