Royal games for PC enthusiasts and mobile gamers alike, made a rock solid move against Apple by giving an option to the users of the game to buy the Royale Pass from their store rather than from Apple store in order to step out from the Apple Tax (30 per cent cut taken by apple), thereby essentially giving their users a 30 per cent discount to buy from Epic Store. It's no doubt that users would jump at this opportunity and abandon the Apple ship for this sweet deal.

In retaliation, Apple soon after released a statement and banned the app from the App Store, but Epic Games were well prepared for it and filed an antitrust lawsuit over App Store to reverse the ban and that the store required the developers to use its payment options.

Epic Games also released their own subversive reel mocking Apple's Famous 1984 ad, it was showmanship at its finest. They also have allies in the different segments of apps and leverages such as Spotify, Netflix, etc.

Seemingly at first this looked like Apple was outmanoeuvred by Epic Games and looked ill-equipped to respond to this. But the tables have turned now as Epic may have started the war but Apple is determined to end it. It seems like a quote from 'The Untouchables' – "He sends one of yours to the hospital, you send one of his to the morgue". Apple retaliated by not only removing Fortnite from the App Store, but also pulling the Epic Games App Store developer license, which means thousands of app such as PUBG Mobile, etc, which use Unreal Engine are in jeopardy.

One would see it as a massive $2 trillion company waging war against a much smaller one for a mere 30 per cent cut, but there are were well prepared for the ban and filed a lawsuit, but could they have done things a different way? Reportedly, there were back channel mail trails between Tim Sweeny and Apple execs regarding the cut and some exclusive deal with Fortnite, which Apple refused to say as it is against their policy, but supposedly they offer some discount to Amazon's Prime video.

Apple is no way obliged to give the deal to Fortnite, since it could do away with anything as it's a massive tech giant, the world's most profitable company now having hit a valuation of 2 Trillion USD.

bigger battles to be fought here. The Apple foundation is based on developers and users, and as it seems from the recent events, Apple is souring the relationship with developers. If it continues on the same path then there may even come a time that users will have to make a switch to different platforms since their favourite apps may no longer be here anymore.

Given the set of rules determined by the company, Epic games could be well aware of the situation and

Everyone knows that Apple hates bad press, but given this precarious situation it is becoming the centre of conversation in the media and gaming community as Epic is digging more and more into the store policy by using Apple's own media tactics (Epic's Apple AD).
