up for that purpose. Anti maskers have come to India too, with covidiot making videos and posting on social media, typically college students with no scientific credentials. We suggest imposing the fine for not wearing masks using the videos as evidence.

LIBRARY TAKEOUT TUNES

Apparently kids in the west do not know how to use a library, and are flummoxed

by the whole procedure of notifying which material you want, scheduling a pickup, and taking out the material from the building. To help with this overwhelmingly complicated process, librarians are coming up with music videos that handhold potential readers through the procedure. On the channel DukeUnivLibraries, the librarian and progressive musician Jamie Keesecker put up a catchy earworm featuring art by his three year old daughter. The track is in fact available on Spotify and Tidal. Forget about dark bass, airpop or black MIDI, there is a brand new genre of music that is taking the interwebs by storm, and that is library takeout jams, at least according to a website that is proud to call itself Cracked. They have actually collected together multiple academic and musical attempts at helping people identify how libraries work, including Library Takeout by Chris Cosby, Curbside baby by Nashville Public Library, and Library Takeout by the Curbside by Timberland Regional Library

LEAF PEEPING

This is an activity taken up by the people residing in temperate latitudes, during autumn. Come September, people start stepping out with the express purpose of taking in the changing colours of the fading leaves, and social media streams begin to be peppered with fall shots. In fact, there are even organised tours for the season, known as foliage tours or colour tours, and it is a custom in Japan for which, for which they have not one but three words. Momijigari means red leaf hunting, kōyō means leaves changing colours and kanpūkai is a communal experience where people get together to behold the leaves. This is also a great time to showcase landscapes with drone shots. Unfortunately in India, leaf peepers have few options, except going into the Himalayas.

A demonstration of smizing that fails upwards

WOKEFISHING

Wokefishing is a new trend on dating apps, where people, mostly men, pretend that they care about issues, or have progressive viewpoints. "Woke" is a term used to refer to people who are very aware about problems in the society, and are willing to do something about it, including being vocal about their opinions on social media and participating in protests. People who pretend to be woke in an attempt to gain partners, are called wokefishers.

For example a toxic lump of crystallised testosterone could pretend to be a feminist, or someone claims to be an environmentalist but arrives for the date on an ancient two stroke motorbike with a modified exhaust with a sound brutal enough to kill baby birds in their nests. The term is similar to, and derived from catfishing, where people pretend to be someone they are not online, through the use of fake or photoshopped images.

Hatfishing involves wearing headgear to hide receding hairlines, kittenfishing is a lighter form of catfishing with embellishments instead of bare faced lies, with say the height or achievement exaggerated, and blackfishing which involves getting a deep tan and changing hairstyle to attract partners of colour.

SMIZING

Smizing is the combination of the words smiling and eyes, and means smiling with your eyes. The word was coined by Tyra Banks in America's Next Top Model, to teach models how to smile with their eyes while keeping the rest of the face neutral, a necessary skill for the profession, or a consequence of all the botox injections. In fact, Banks has also released an app that teaches you how to put on such a face. Social media stars on TikTok and Instagram know that smizes make for better selfies, and it is an important skill to learn for video conferencing. Also, when wearing a mask, a smize is sure to brighten up your face. Smizing as a concept is not something new, Charlie Chaplin was an expert in it, and many Renaissance portraits capture a smize. You are going to go in front of a mirror and practice aren't you? 📖
