are also similarly priced, so there is really not much of a choice here. Even though the devices may be easy to use, the interpretation of the results are best left to the experts. The reason why the oximeters are so popular is that because it can possibly be an indication during the early phases of Covid-19. The theoretical basis for this is that the virus first infects and spreads in the lungs, reducing the capacity of the body to derive oxygen from the air. This is strictly speaking, not true, as the lungs of each patient react differently to the infection, and at times the lungs may not be seriously affected at all. As such, oximeters are not meant to be used as diagnostic tools for detecting Covid-19, and there could be a whole number of other causes for a decreased saturation of oxygen in the blood. Where oximeters can help is when a patient is diagnosed as suffering from the disease through nasal swabs and proper lab tests. In such a situation, if the patient is self isolated at home, an oximeter can detect lowering oxygen levels, and provide an advanced warning if it looks like a patient's health is going to deteriorate. Even in that situation, the device has to be used, and the measurements interpreted, using the guidance of a healthcare professional.

AIRWAY RESTAURANTS

Singapore Airlines had a A380 double-decker super-jumbo just parked at Changi airport and not going anywhere, so they came up with the bright idea of hosting a dinner party. The response was so enthusiastic that the "tickets" for the "flight" sold out within 30 minutes, even though it cost about 35K INR, and was only taking its passengers on a gastronomical adventure. It was supposed to be a one time event, but considering the response, the airlines opened up the experience for even more days, and made available more time slots for serving the passengers. Along with the meal, the customers are also served drinks, and a token for taking home. This is how the worlds largest passenger airline ended up becoming a restaurant. The company is offering additional food related services to its customers, including home delivery of airline food, and a chef who visits the home and prepares the airline food before serving it, with all the assorted cutlery that you can expect to find on an actual airplane. This is some way to cure the obsessive wanderlust of some passengers, we think. Singapore Airlines is not the only carrier to experiment with pop up restaurants though.

Thai Airways converted one of its office spaces into a pop up restaurant that serves airline food. The interiors of the space have been modified to resemble the interiors of an aircraft. The seats are actual seats from airplanes, and the other furniture is made up of repurposed airplane parts. Diners can expect to see bits and pieces of planes all around them. For example, the tables are made up of the wheels of planes. There is even a ladder leading up to the entrance to provide a sense of adventure, and customers have to show a QR code they receive on their smartphones, to simulate a boarding pass. The restaurant is open for five days a week, and for now it is only available in Bangkok, but the airlines plan to expand to other cities if their pilot program is successful.

HOMEGATING

It is the festive season, usually the time when near and dear ones come together for celebrations of all kinds. If you are looking around for a place to buy a festus pole, do not bother, we know the easiest and best way to source one is to get one commissioned from the neighbourhood carpenter. Now the celebration also means inviting people over, and meeting people at their homes, and this has to be undertaken in a safe and responsible manner. It is a good idea to explain to the management of housing complexes, as well as your neighbours that you are planning to host so many people. The most important thing is careful planning about how many people are going to be there, what they are going to be doing, and then following that plan. Make sure that people do not share containers for food, and that there are hand sanitisers handy. Keep a list of all the people who attended, because if something goes wrong this will be useful for contact tracing. Just before the celebration, remind the guests to remain at home in case they are experiencing any symptoms. You do not want to have a guy with a runny nose snorting loudly in the same room as your pizza. If you take the necessary precautions, there is no reason why you should not have a great time with your friends and family, and usher in the new year with some much needed joy.
