BROO ADVOCATES BUCKWHEAT AS A SUPERFEED

Broo is a small local startup with an aim to advocate buckwheat as a superfood, and sell packaged buckwheat products, as well as cakes, cookies, muffins and even tea made out of buckwheat. The startup is active on social media platforms, and has plans to eventually scale up to deliveries across India, but for the moment is only servicing local orders. The goal of Broo is “to popularise buckwheat in Ladakh by commercialising it widely as well as to promote healthy eating habits in the region” and the business model is to “manufacture eatables (packaged confectionery) made out of buckwheat”.

all reasons why they should continue cultivating the crop, through workshops and campaigns conducted by us.” Then, Broo outlines plans for stimulating buckwheat farming, “Usually buckwheat is not grown in all parts of Ladakh. However, the farmers who grow buckwheat still continue to grow even now. By producing products we believe that the demand for buckwheat would increase eventually. In this way, the farmers could utilize their full potential to grow in order to meet the demand.”

As part of its promotions, Broo plans to use technology, “we will be using social media to promote our products Initially via., Instagram and Facebook. Gradually, with the increase the mountains.” While the chocolates are different from the mass produced alternatives, THC makes it a point to clarify that they do not claim it to be a healthier alternative, “there are high chances of our chocolates to be healthier simply because of the ingredients that we use. However, we have not validated it and nor do we claim it to be healthier than the traditional one.” The idea is to create a network of entrepreneurs, who will all be invested in the brand and business, creating that many more jobs in the region. “THC aims to create and promote a network of Micro-entrepreneurs (setting up small and independent manufacturing units) working for the brand in their localities instead of hiring just employees. This idea is supposed to be communicated via our Brand PR across all social media presence and on our website. We are already creating more content like videos in production, product photoshoots etc. Apart from that, we have been planning to focus on offline marketing more, targeting tourists markets for effective brand awareness, such as display stands for retailers, print media, Banners on shops and highways etc.”

It is not just an idea and business plan though, underpinning the endeavour is custom tech, to make sure that the product is the same no matter where it is produced. “In context to the idea of creating small units across the Himalayan Region, ensuring standardization in the process is a problem. Hence, THC aims to work with IIT Mandi to develop a new technology incorporating local existing thermal heating systems, and hence leverage technology to ensure the highest quality products available to customers.”

Little Green World is an initiative that teaches the best practices to safeguard the Himalayan environment, straight to the young school children. At pre-

Package design of THC

The startup is in the position of having to drum up interest in both consumers and the farmers. In terms of creating a market, Broo explains its plans as “first of all, through our products we vision to promote this superfood, which is why we will be spending a certain effort on Packaging. Along with its nutritional value, a story or a fun fact about Buckwheat will be printed on every packet of our products. Secondly, while sourcing buckwheat from farmers we will tell them about its nutritional values and in sales we will expand our customer base throughout India, through our official website.”
