↑ The Yorkshire Museum showed off this twelfth century carved stone that features three demons tormenting a man. While the man is pinned, one of the demons is sucking out his soul much like the Dementor's kiss. The soul is shaped somewhat like the infant form of the man.

← Shown here are examples of Icelandic scrolls with magical spells written on them from the collection of the Swedish History Museum. One of them is for inducing perpetual flatulence.

← This coffin design posted by the US National Archives, has air holes in the box in case the people are in doubt if the person is really alive or dead during the time of the burial.

← The National Museum of Scotland showcased these tiny coffins with miniature dolls in them. There are seventeen of these, and no living person knows their intended use.

← This Japanese illustration from the Ota Memorial Museum of Art shows what a jack-o-lantern is actually supposed to look like, beyond the pumpkin head.

← Belonging to the collection of the National Museums of Scotland, this unexplained exhibit is one of those mysterious and odd objects that nobody understands much about.

← Peden's mask, another item from the National Museum of Scotland, this was a mask used by the outlawed minister Alexander Peden, and passed on through generations in the family.
