

Wake Up, Samurai!

Limbitless is making a real-world prosthetic based on Johnny Silverhand's bionic arm from Cyberpunk 2077. <http://digit.in/jan21-95>

The Zodiac Update

The Zodiac Killer's taunting 340 cipher message finally gets cracked by cryptologists, after 51 years. <http://digit.in/jan21-96>

Fruits and vegetables are easily accessible and incredibly suitable as well as nutritious mediums for creating pieces of art! The best thing about these short lived creations is that they are delicious too!

Aditya Madanapalle | aditya@digit.in

↑ Anna Chojnicka started making pieces of art by bruising bananas when the lockdown started. The shading is achieved by timing the cuts and bruises, and letting the banana darken over time. Believe it or not, no ink is used in this piece of art, and the banana remains edible!

← Stephan Brusche uses the banana peels in unique ways by carefully unwrapping and cutting them to create pieces of art that are half painting and half sculpture.

← Watermelons can be carved up into intricate sculptures, that remain edible. Shown here is an example with detailed doves in the front, with a bouquet of mouth watering roses on the top.

← Apples are great canvases for art, the skin can be peeled away carefully to reveal patterns below, or the apple itself can be cut up and carved in creative ways before being eaten.

← Daniele Barresi makes incredibly intricate carvings into fruits, shown here is an example on a pear. The carvings are made by hand using just an ordinary blade pen.

← Traditional artisans from Bali make amazing and intricate sculptures on coconut shells mostly containing natural motifs, shown here is an example of an ornamental candle shade.

← Daniele Barresi is so prolific that we simply had to pick another example from the same artist. Each sculpture is planned based on the characteristics of the grown plant.