F

or someone who is just getting into movies, be it as a hobby or a profession, things can seem quite intimidating at first. You don't know what a good starting point is or essentially, what qualities to look for in a film. Educating yourself on the subject might appear like a Herculean task, taking into account the never-ending layers of junk that is available on the internet. In search of good, credible sources of information, one could easily end up spending hours of their time on Reddit and YouTube, going down numerous rabbit holes that usually lead to nowhere. To help simplify things, we have put together a list of quality online movie resources that you should definitely check out. Plus, it won't cost you a single dime to sign up to any of them (unless you opt for upgrades).

IMDb

IMDb is the world's largest, oldest and most popular online database for not just movies, but also TV shows, video games or pretty much any form of visual media that's on the internet. The site is notorious for its highly specific ratings (out of 10), which are cast by registered users, and also the ability to add stuff to your watchlist. And that's probably what most of you readers might be using IMDb for anyway. But it goes deeper than that. This website is a literal database. As in, it contains everything you need to know about a movie, down to the T! From cast lineup to awards information to high-res stills, it's got everything in one place. And if you scroll down long enough, it also gives you details on the box office earnings, technical specifications and hardware, fun trivia, FAQs, and even lists out the entire film crew that were involved in the craft. It houses countless reviews from established movie critics and even tells you where you could stream a particular movie from. It's this all-in-one package that film lovers should keep bookmarked at all costs! So the next time you need to look up something, you aren't forced to jump between multiple websites. Or even mindlessly type out your query for that matter! Hence, saving time.

Letterboxd is a more simplistic, yet fun approach to whatever IMDb does. Think of it like a social media platform for movies that is completely user-oriented. The application is generally used for keeping track or a log of whatever films you've seen, while also letting you rate (out of 5 stars) and review them. Users can add movies to their watchlist with ease, and it also lets you know where you could legally watch them as well. Additionally, if you click on a director or actor's profile, you get a statistical percentage of the stuff you've seen and what's left. Thus helping you keep better track of your favourite's work.

Being a user-focused website, you can find, follow and engage with other people online who may or may not have similar taste in movies. You can see what's popular among them, what they've been watching, their reviews, activity, etc. It is loaded with tons of great, super-clean interactive features that bring cinephiles together. Another cool functionality of the website is that people can build lists of movies. So let's just say you are in the mood for some "Golden Globe 2021 nominated films" or some "Anxiety-Inducing Cinema". You can simply type-in the query and instantly get access to these lovely, precise lists that are curated by users themselves. From there, it's simply a matter of watching them (if you have time) or adding them to your watchlist for later. Also, the app/website does not rely on any weird, spy-like algorithm that recommends movies to you. You only get what you search for. Nothing more, nothing less.
