

kids today think it's weird for groups to sit together and just talk! There are already reports of slumber parties where all involved text one another instead of actually talking. Many first world kids took to the pandemic and lockdowns like ducks to water, because they're already nose deep in screens anyway!

GOVERNMENTS

Ah! Here come the real bad guys. No matter who you are or what age you are, you might be fine with Facebook reading your WhatsApp messages, or Google listening to your home conversations in order to show you ads, but you are certainly not fine with the government doing the same. As always, we are politically agnostic here at Digit, so please don't write in to us because you think your favourite political party is somehow better than the others. We're political pessimists and wouldn't trust politicians as far as we could throw them – which is not very far...

Rants aside, Gen C is likely to find privacy useful when they start getting arrested or fined for saying or doing things that the powers that be deem inappropriate. However, what's also true is that kids these days are already turning to more fun stuff that's as apolitical as can be. Still, in the new age of the internet where people seem to go looking for things to be offended at, the biggest challenge will be the sentiments of very vocal people. Because the Gen X and Gen Y (Zoomers) will be the vocal "old people" shaking their fists at everything Gen C kids do, we can only hope they're less irritable than the Baby Boomers (1946 to 1964 born) and Gen X (1965 to 1980 born) people are today.

Plus, if current trends are anything to go by, Gen C isn't going to be interested in hiding their faces. With creative short videos being the norm, promoting yourself means showing the world who you are. Perhaps Gen C will be smart enough to just steer clear of politics altogether which might keep them safe from backlash. However, being shy and obsessed with privacy is not something they are going to be. 🇺🇸

SOCIAL IS EVERYTHING!

Commerce and creativity will rule the internet

Robert Sovereign-Smith | robert@digit.in

"Duh! Captain obvious." Some might say. Of course commerce and creativity will rule the internet, that's like saying data is all bits and bytes. This was meant more like a reminder than an ah-ha moment. Too often we get caught up in looking at the trends and what it is kids want to do with their time, and forget that all of this humongous infrastructure that holds up the internet probably costs billions of USD a day! Whether it's servers, ISP pipes, satellite connections, electric costs, and more, all add up to a very big cost which means you cannot run a global business from a basement like you could in the 1980s. A service that cannot make money is doomed to die quickly, because investors need to see your plan to earn them back their money even before they invest in you!

Q: Do Kids care about money?

A: Heck no!

Q: Do they like advertising?

A: Hahahaha! That's a joke, right?

WHAT MAKES A GOOD SOCIAL NETWORK? (KIDS EDITION)

First things first, your parents shouldn't be on it. And neither should your grandparents, or your creepy middle-aged neighbour, and definitely not anyone who has any place of authority in your life. This bit is probably going to continue to hold true even into Gen C. Even if their elder Gen Alpha cousins and Zoomer parents are eager to show them all of their social exploits to be cool, Gen C kids are still not going to want to dance and lip sync on TikTok like mum and dad. If there's something they can do that causes mum and dad to get high BP, then that's what they're going to be drawn towards. If the trend of Gen Alpha kids is anything to go by, and we extrapolate a little, then Gen C are going to want to form real connections with real people. Gen Alpha doesn't want to waste time typing out long paragraphs on Facebook, or snide 240 character insults on Twitter... Instead, they just want to be spontaneous, and talk to people. They

"Shameless plug for the Fast Track to Discord that comes with this issue."
