Fries against Tidal

Escape from the gerontocracy and opinionators with an exclusive concert in a fast food app. Wait, wut?

IN APP CONCERTS

It can make sense for ticketing apps or streaming services to host live virtual concerts, especially in times of accelerated digitisation because of the ongoing pandemic. What makes us raise one eyebrow just a little bit is that McDonalds recently announced a novel “experience” known as Golden Start, to celebrate the lunar new year, which was a collab with Asian artist collective 88rising, that started with a week long period of episodic drops on IGTV, ending with a live concert that could only be experienced from within the McDonald’s app. It is only a matter of time before other apps start doing this, and we are pretty sure that someone in the product team of a fitness app is knee deep in putting together a socially distanced, covid appropriate, virtual zumba concert that is available exclusively on this gym app. This is too much to order, just send me the large fries and the large strawb shake pls.

Opinionators are people who get paid to provide only their opinions. These might be columnists in newspapers, experts called on frequently to panel discussions on news channels, or increasingly in many cases, the editors and publishers of the news themselves. In cyberspace, this extends to a type of content creator, on both video and blogging platforms, that thrive based on only providing their own insights and analysis. This is not necessarily a bad thing, and we really like to read the thoughtful and considered opinion pieces on sites such as the DailyO, but giving an opinion, even when asked for, is an art, and not everyone is an artist. Now within bubbles and the kinds of networks and spaces we have created online, inflammatory, harsh, extremist, controversial, and just plain sick opinionators can get and hold more attention, which is the currency of the information age. In our opinion, this is when things start taking a turn for the worse, when opinionators make a living out of just being vile and disgusting.
