Monopoly Bid is yet another card game interpretation of Monopoly, but is a different game from Monopoly Deal. Each of the players have to use the cards in their hand to bid for property cards, in an effort to collect three sets of property cards. In each round, players have to make the choice of using up too much money for a particular card, or saving up for better opportunities further down the pile. An auctioning title with Monopoly seems like a natural fit, so let us take a look at how it plays.

Setup and gameplay

The cards with the red back are money or action cards, while the cards with the blue backs are property cards. In the box, there are three times as many red cards as blue cards, so the property cards are stacked together with the red cards. The setup and gameplay is pretty straightforward. The property cards form one auction pile, the action and money cards together form another draw pile, and the third is a discard pile. All players are given five red cards each, and the game begins. In each round, all players draw a card from the red pile, play as many action cards as they want, and once everyone is done, the top card from the blue pile is auctioned. Players secretly bid for the card. The players are supposed to countdown to each bid, but who we kidding, that aint happening. People are gonna try and slip in cards till its time to show your bids. The bids are revealed once everyone has placed their money, and the top bidder gets the card, discarding the money, while the rest get to keep their money for the next auction

The first player to collect three sets of properties wins. Just like Monopoly Deal, there are larger and smaller property sets, and the entire value of the property is derived from what people are willing to spend for it. . There is no penalty for accumulating too many cards. The action cards are Nope! for denying another player an action, stealing any single property, the wild card itself that can be placed into any property set, and draw 2, which allows you to pick up two cards in exchange for the action card that you just played. Now the thing is that the wild card cannot be moved around between incomplete sets, like it is possible in Monopoly

Deal, but it is totally possible to steal an action card, so if you have a steal in hand, as well as a block, it is possible to let your wild card be stolen just so you can finish another set and win the game. This title is very easy to understand, and the rules are much simpler than Monopoly Deal.

Verdict

Just like other Monopoly titles geared towards a particular experience, such as Monopoly Speed, the game sheds all the non essentials. The rules are really simple, and even total newbs can just get going in a new game without the rules having to be explained. Each game is short, people can leave and join any time, people can team up to play together, and decks can be clubbed together to accommodate larger parties. It is not too differentiated from the Monopoly Deal experience, and people might prefer more challenging games. However, this is just the perfect game to wind up or wind down a gaming session. The game is flexible enough to accommodate house rules, just like Uno or Monopoly Deal, so there is a lot of replayability value. *
