Lucifer S5B

★★★★☆ | Lucifer S5B, S5 Part 2, continues where 5A left off, and what a cliffhanger that was. Spoilers ahead, in case you haven't watched the season yet. At the end of part 1 of Season 5, we see the introduction of God himself into the show, who has seemingly appeared to stop his celestial children from bickering with each other. We half expected Morgan Freeman to show up, but that's just wishful thinking. However, Dennis Haysbert definitely managed to pull God off, and is a solid candidate for narrating anyone's life. With the appearance of Dad (with a capital D), Lucifer, Michael and Amenadiel have put a stop to their fighting – for now. To appease Lucifer, Big G even banishes Michael back to the Silver City. Knowing Michael though, his scheming is far from over as we eventually find out towards the end of the season. The season does a great job of 'normalizing' the celestial family, making them look like they too suffer from the same problems that we humans do, only on a cosmic scale. This is honestly something the show as a whole has done really well since Season 1.

The usual 'will they, won't they' between Lucifer and Chloe also continues this season, and he's as unsure (or is he?) as ever about how he feels about her. To the point where he feels like he needs to become God in order to be worthy of her. By the end of the season there does seem to be some definite progress between Lucifer and the detective's relationship. With the introduction of God there are quite a few funny moments in the season; one of the episode's was a musical because God was causing everyone around him to 'break into song and dance' without realising it. In yet another episode we see God meeting Dan, which ends up being a pretty funny (awkward for them) meeting, for reasons that anyone who has followed the show up until this point will know. At the climax of the show we have a war between the angels of heaven, and let's just say, the conclusion is Lucifer saying the words, "Oh my me".

Ragnarok S2

★★★★☆ | Season 1 of Ragnarok ends with a bang, but it really doesn't compare to the bang season 2 begins with. For those who don't know, Ragnarok is a show on Netflix about Norse mythology, where the gods and giants of old are still alive and present in the modern world. This aspect of it gives off some serious Percy Jackson vibes, if you're familiar with the books, where the Greek Gods are alive in the modern world. Ragnarok takes place in a fictional city in Norway called Edda. Interestingly, the location the show was filmed in is called Odda.

The giants, sworn enemies of the gods, now known as the Jutuls, are the founders of the fifth largest company in Norway, Jutul Industries.

After season 1, the company is now being investigated for polluting the water supply in the city, and the Jutuls are forced on the backfoot to try and recover from the backlash.

In season 2, the protagonist, Magne Seier has just come to terms with the fact that he's Thor, and is trying to find/build his legendary hammer, Mjolnir. Magne's brother, Laurits, finds out he's half-giant, and it's made very evident that he's Loki. Not the MCU Loki, but the actual Loki from Norse mythology. He struggles with his sexual identity and inability to fit in because of how different he is from everyone else. Much like Loki, he is adept at stringing people along and playing the long game; there are several times throughout the season where we're not sure who's side Laurits is on, although by the end of the season it does feel like he's picked his side, but only time will tell. Season 2 also sees the introduction of more gods, to join the fight against the giants; Freya, Tyr and even Odin have joined the war council. The season also deals with Magne needing to come to terms with his role and power, and the price of war.
