Most anime characters have distinct characteristic features which include large and emotive eyes, and expressive facial features; that usually make it easier to identify it as an anime show. The biggest misconception for non-anime viewers is that anime is specifically meant for a younger demographic, a.k.a. kids. They are unaware that anime are rated for a wide audience based on age groups, just like western TV series and movies. In fact, there are anime genres that are age appropriate only for adults! These include genres such as gore, psychological, dark comedy, and others.

This is unlike most traditional cartoon series that are comical themed shows with the target audience being children and teenagers. Anime usually have more detailed storylines (although there are definitely some cartoons with complex plots too), and are distributed across different age groups as per the target audience.

WHAT ARE MANGAS? ARE MANGA AND ANIME THE SAME THING?

If you're at all familiar with anime, even for a short period, then you'd probably have heard of the word 'manga' as well. However, these are two different forms of art altogether. Basically, manga are Japanese comic books, which often serve as the inspiration for an anime series. Again, while manga is just the Japanese word for comic books, in the West and other anime influenced countries, manga refers to comics from Japan only, especially with an anime plot/setting. If you're already a fan of both, or if you're simply a fan of anime as well as an ardent reader, consider adding a manga series to your reading list. Manga are usually source material for anime, so if you like staying ahead of the plot, maybe consider reading the manga to know just what's going to happen next. You know... if you're the scum of the internet and like spoiling it for the non-manga reading anime watchers. >:D
