INFLUENCER ANXIETY

Hype houses, content homes, collab houses or TikTok mansions cropped up as a response to the pandemic, where a bunch of influencers got holed up together in a bubble, usually a sprawling, instagrammable property. These have now become content farms, where investors control the daily routines of those social media stars paying for their accommodation, with some additional branded deals thrown in, which would probably have made these content homes targets of porch pirates, but that is another problem. Predictably, these TikTok zoomers are experiencing the same pressure and anxiety that caused a lot of the YouTube creators and Twitch streamers to burn out.

SUPERSTAR CITIES

In some urban cities in the US, the property market has blown up much more than the income growth rate in the area, leading to large gap between the incomes and the prices of the houses in the highest locations. Economists Joseph Gyourko, Christopher Mayer and Todd Sinai coined the term "superstar cities" in 2006 to describe these kind of cities in a study.

Economists and researchers looking at these superstar (think metropolitan) cities now have seen some new patterns emerging because of the outbreak. The prices for the properties are going down in the cities, and there is now doubt if the prices will ever go back to the 2019 level, when the prices were at their most. This is because the rapid transformation in digitisation may point to the demand having peaked. Within the cities also, people are not moving around as widely and going to as many places as before the pandemic, even as restrictions are being lifted. Researchers predict that it may be many years before the activity recovers as well. Additionally, studies have also shown that within the superstar cities, the populations are getting less homogenised and diverse, with increasing clusters or clumps of segregations. People are less likely to interact with people from another race, during the pandemic.

SEALION

Coined by the Wondermark webcomics in 2014, sealioning is the process of trolling or harassing someone with an incessant but polite stream of probing questions, appearing to sincerely question people about their beliefs and opinions. These are questions such as "why do you believe that", or "can you explain this", or "how can you possibly justify that", and are designed to simply exhaust the responder and is a form of abuse, comparable to a denial of service attack on a web server. All the attention and the bandwidth of the responder
