is engaged in what is apparently a healthy debate, but one that is actually going nowhere. While the verbal sealioning emerged after the original comic, now the griever or troll who engages in sealioning is known as a sealion, with the Collins dictionary adding it as a noun.

FAMILECT

There is a word for the combination of in-jokes, pet names and private memes used by a families, that in these times have extended to groups on instant messaging platforms and the inter-continental Zoom calls. The language used in these situations is the “familect”, and as most people have spent most of the pandemic in doors, with their families, the private familects have evolved rapidly over the months in isolation. Even in biobubbles, or say content homes or quaranteams, where people who are unrelated come together to live for long periods of time in isolation from others, the unique sort of language and home slang emerges. Researchers studying the family dialects describe listening in to families like being immersed in alien worlds. For more on the topic, read “Why We Speak More Weirdly at Home” in The Atlantic.

TIME COMPRESSION

Researchers investigating how people perceive the passage of time in an experiment where subjects were asked to play a simple maze solving game using a screen and in VR. They were asked to stop the game after five minutes had passed. The study showed that those using VR experiences were likely to go on playing the game for 72.6 seconds, on average, more than those using screens. This means that the immersive VR experiences warp the perception of time. The study provides the scientific evidence for what a lot of VR nuts have been saying that time seems to pass slower in the immersive experiences. The researchers are now looking at some positive applications of time compression, for uncomfortable experiences such as surgeries or long distance flights.

The leaked flier make sure you have a Covid passport, which is a document showing that you are vaccinated and can travel. The second meaning is a vacation taken to celebrate a successful vaccination, so there are a bunch of vaccinated work-esters making vibe checks on where they want to hop on next. Finally, we have the third meaning, which is a vacation planned specifically to get vaccinated, which may be a feasible option for those places where vaccines are in incredibly high demand, such as India. In fact, a flyer prepared by a New Delhi company for a potential opportunity got leaked and went viral even though the company was not in fact offering such a service. The idea was to take a short trip to Russia, get both doses of the vaccine, and do some sightseeing during the time that you are there. Other tour operators had to clarify to their customers who had the same idea that the procedure for getting vaccines in Russia were strict (as one can imagine) and that foreigners are not being given vaccines yet, much to the disappointment of Putinstas everywhere.

BOOST YOUR VOCAB

These are the words that you need to start using in your everyday conversations to sound on fleek:

- Soonicorn: A company on the verge of being a unicorn
- Patchwriting: The process of superficially rewriting from a source, keeping in place much of the vocabulary and structure
- Shibu: The short form of the shiba inu coin cryptocurrency (don't make the noob mistake of calling it Shiba)
- Cheugy: Something that is the exact opposite of trending. It is so boring that thinking of it is a strong sedative.
- Ghost kitchen: The more apt way to refer to a cloud kitchen, a restaurant that only serves on food delivery platforms.
