BLACK AND TAN TERRIER

The black and tan terrier was one of the earliest English terrier breeds that emerged due to use in what were known as “rural sports”. The terriers were original work dogs named after their propensity to hunt foxes, badgers and smaller vermin, digging them out of their burrows and hidey holes. The black and tan terrier was a smaller breed, sleek, nimble and lively, better adapted for hunting rodents, too weak to engage with foxes or even terriers of their own size. These dogs became very popular for use in rat baiting pits. This was a bloodsport where rats

With a lesser reliance on working dog breeds, many of them have gone extinct or evolved for modern requirements

ALAUNT

The Alaunt were large dogs with short coats that were used by herdsman and huntsmen in Central Asia and Europe. According to one theory, all the modern mastiffs and bulldogs originated from the Alaunts, including the legendary Molossus war dogs from Greece, which are themselves extinct. The dogs were equally good as work dogs, hunting large game, going to war with their masters, and herding sheep. All across Europe, they were bred for a number of specific purposes, including sighthounds, bloodhounds, guard dogs, and the fighting dogs used in bloodsport. While the dog was known to be aggressive and stubborn, it was considered to be
