

Woz supports Right to Repair

Steve Wozniak, defends right to repair, arguing that Apple was based on open source technology. <https://dgit.in/jul21-27>

Man flying through Times Square

Video of man flying across Times Square with custom hoverboard goes viral. <https://dgit.in/jul21-28> were primarily bred for use in dog fighting, a bloodsport where two pet dogs were pitted against each other and made to fight to the death. While there are several origin stories of the breed (including being introduced by the pirate Paul Jones), these were among the earliest bull terriers, bred from bulldogs and terriers. The Blue Paul Terrier was a hardy courageous dog known for continuing to fight even after taking a lot of punishment. These dogs were known to be tricky fighters using many tactics. The breed got its name from the bluish colouring of its coat, which are suspected to have been because of an infusion of genes from Italian greyhounds. Another related terrier species bred for dog fighting had a contrasting colouration and was known as the Red Smut Terrier. Both these breeds went extinct with the decline of the popularity of dog fighting.

BUCKHOUND

In the late thirteenth century, the nobility in England were maintaining different types of dogs specifically for hunting different types of deer. While some dogs were for hunting the large stags, others were for hunting bucks, or fallow deer. In some texts, the staghounds are used interchangeably with buckhounds or buckhounds are considered to be a subset of staghounds. The dogs were used for hunting rabbits, foxes and even martens. Packs of buckhounds were considered to be family heirlooms, and were bred for generations. As a matter of tradition, the royalty maintained packs far after they had fallen out of general use, owing to the fact that Deer had become scarce in England. Those maintaining the packs for the nobility were granted rare hunting licenses just for the sake of training the animals. Buckhounds worked in tandem with limehounds or "lymers", dogs that tracked deer across long distances using scent.

BULLENBEISSER

The Bullenbeisser, also known as the German Bulldog, was a species of dog bred for baiting bulls. Another closely related breed that is at times considered to be the same as the Bärenbeisser, which is the German bear baiting dog (the two names mean bull biter and bear biter in German). The Bullenbeisser was one of the many European breeds derived from crossing Mastiffs with Terriers, to make small, powerful and energetic hunting dogs. These dogs were persistent in tracking big game, and powerful enough to grapple boars and bears till the hunters reached them. The breeds became extinct because German owners started breeding their dogs too much with British Bulldogs, leading to a now familiar breed of dogs known as the Boxer. The boxers became popular as loyal but ferocious pets, as well as cattle herding dogs. With the loss of hunting grounds to civilisation, big game became scarce in Germany, and with it, the Bullenbeissers.

ST. JOHN'S DOG

Also known as the St. John's water dog, this breed originated from various European working dogs, and was a favorite among fishermen and seafarers. The dog was known to be a hard worker, even obsessive and would help retrieve fish caught in lines, fish that escaped the fishermen, paddle back with distant nets, and keep men from drowning by grasping the necks and angling the faces above the water line. Additionally, the dog was docile, easy to handle, remained calm on a boat, and enjoyed being in the water. The breed doubled up as a very capable work dog as well, dragging sleds through the snow during the winter months. The St. John's water dog is the progenitor of many modern retrievers, including the Golden Retriever. The St. John's water dog was also known as the Newfoundland and the Labrador, and was crossed with the settler to give the Labrador Retriever, which is now shortened to the Labrador. 🐕