Hi Digit

First of all, I have been reading Digit from the very beginning when it started or you can say when you people use to market CHIP. I have always seen you people updating yourself from the very beginning.

Now with the changing time, people don't want to spend much time on long content, so we need to make the topic look shorter for example if we go to medium.com it provides us read time

(like 5 or 6 mins of reading time). This will give the user an option to plan or estimate its reading slot accordingly for that particular article. If you people can provide this kind of feature in your magazine (soft and hard both) then it will be more appreciated.

Another thing which I wanted here is that change the look and feel of the whole magazine where people will like to keep it for their lifetime, as Apple did with their packaging where the consumer would like to keep it as long as the iPhone or iPad itself. In your case, you can start with the language localization of the magazine. You can first experiment with it with your digital version.

Hey there folks,

I have been subscribed to Digit for the past two years, and it goes without saying it really has been a

Letter of the Month

Dear Digit,

My father represented the Indian Territorial Army and the problem with it is, most of the time is you live in a cocoon devoid of external connect, unable to access everything cutting edge or even read about it.

Thankfully though, that also means we have best in class resources funded by central govt available to us including school libraries. I was in 6th grade when my eyes fell upon "Jasubhai medias' Digit". What attracted me to it? The shiny CDs!

I sort of grew up with Digit, each section of the magazine taught me so many lessons!

I assembled my first PC in 7th grade soon started selling them too, by then Digit introduced Agent001 and thus Lamington road. This made me get out of my cocoon, drive down to Bombay, and negotiate best possible prices, all this at a tender age of 14! I also had to deal with repairs myself, tinkering around my PC. The confidence came from a heady mix of young blood and intricately detailed articles in the Digit.

Remember the floods of 2006? Modern Bombay had I think flooded that much for the first time and Digit carried the piece in the newly introduced BTS section Digit Diaries (it used to be at end of the magazine good to see it upfront a decade later). All I remember is how most of the guys slept in the office that night and sort of had a LAN party as they had the games and tons of graphics cards until electricity ran out – My takeaway? If you love what you do it doesn't matter how testing the conditions are you will still make it through.

The Thinkdigit forum funded so many of my upgrades, the Bazaar section was a lifesaver! Kudos to you for still keeping it alive.

I still have Fastracks from 2007/08, it used to be 150-200 odd pages. I don't know why that changed.

Years back, I wrote about how I would like the content on the right hand side and adverts on the left side, it makes it so much easier to hold it, magazine today almost has no ads but whatever little there is, they still are on the right side.

Teardown section IMHO is a waste of space, after all we do have iFixit YouTube videos for the same.

I'm not sure but have you done away with the crazy shootouts you used to do? Like 30 monitors or 20 graphic cards tested in a month followed by a detailed write up and scoring them individually. I would totally love to see those again.

Why is Agent001 down to just one question? you could use the space from the "Teardown" section for this. I used to look forward to it as a student as it had such varied problems from the real world user scenarios compared generic "Builds section".

In the builds section can we have one under 1 lakh for photographers/graphic designers as well? I understand one of the gaming rigs might suffice but a dedicated Quadro option would be nice.

Hi Akshay, thanks for the detailed and thought out feedback. I'll respond to your queries as best I can without wasting too much space, so that more letters from others can fit in to the limited space:

- 1) We learned to concise better to prevent raising the costs to the readers, that's why Fast Track's are shorter now. I don't think they contain less information, just less verbosity.
- 2) Some study somewhere decided people look more to the right instead of the left, and for as long as paper is printed, ads will be on the right.
- 3) The images are from iFixit, the text is ours. Many readers love it.
- 4) We choose the most relevant question for the month.
- 5) Your last question sounds like an Agent question :-)
