Dizo GoPods

Essentially just rebranded Realme Buds Air 2s

Dizo, the first brand under the Realme techlife ecosystem, is still in its infancy stages. We are reviewing the newly-launched Dizo GoPods, an Active Noise Cancelling earphone in the sub 5K price bracket. The Dizo GoPods are actually rebranded Realme Buds Air 2s. The earbuds are feature-rich and look great on paper, at least, but do we need a rebranded Buds Air 2 on the market?

BUILD AND COMFORT

The Dizo GoPods look almost identical to the Realme Buds Air 2 barring for the colour. The GoPods are available in two colour variants – Smoky Grey and Creme White. The charging case has a cobble-shaped design that is flat enough to easily slip into pockets. The buds sport a dual-tone finish – glossy white stems and matte black buds. The back of the stems has touch-sensitive surfaces to control both music playback and calls. The touch controls are reasonably responsive and worked well.

As for the fit, Dizo provides a total of three pairs of silicone ear tips for users to choose from (S, M and L). The earbuds have an assuring, snug fit and are secure even during physical activities such as walking, jogging, and others.

FEATURES

Since the Dizo GoPods are rebranded Realme Buds Air 2s, they have the exact same features as them, which automatically makes it an attractive, value for money offering. You get premium features such as Active Noise Cancellation and Transparency Mode on these earbuds that are priced very competitively. Now, let's delve into some other features. You can connect the Dizo GoPods to a pretty decent accompanying app called Realme Link.

PERFORMANCE.....	70

The app's UI is clean, easy to use, and has a fair number of customisation options. You can toggle between noise cancellation modes, activate features such as game mode, in-ear detection, and volume enhancer, and you can even customise controls. As for the touch controls, you can tweak the controls within the app. There's no way to add volume controls though, which is very disappointing.

Other features include IPX5 water resistance, USB Type-C charging, and mono earbud use where you can use either bud independently of each other.

PERFORMANCE

The Dizo GoPods sport the exact 10mm driver with DLC coating as found on the Realme Buds Air 2. The earbuds have a consumer-friendly V-shaped sound signature with a boosted bass response and boosted highs. The earphones have a punchy and lively bass response that many will enjoy, although the bass does lack some detail. The highs are decent as well, although the drop off is steep which robs some details from the highs.

As for the Active Noise Cancellation performance, the buds provide an impressive experience for this price range. Constant, low-frequency sounds such as an AC's drone, airplane's rumble, and similar sounds are cancelled very well. The microphone on the Dizo GoPods is mediocre, at best. As for wireless connectivity, the earphones come with Bluetooth v5.2 and we faced no issues with connection whatsoever.

BATTERY LIFE

The Dizo GoPods' battery life is rated at 25 hours with both buds and charging case with ANC turned off. The earbuds themselves have a battery life of 5 hours with ANC off according to the company. In our tests, the buds lasted about 3.5 hours with ANC turned on and at around 60 per cent volume. The buds also support Fast Charging where just 10 minutes of charging will provide users about 2 hours of playtime with ANC off. The battery life is pretty good overall and it beats out the OnePlus Buds Z and the Oppo Enco W51 in terms of total playback time.

VERDICT

The Dizo GoPods is a solid, value for money TWS under 5K. It not only provides ANC on a budget, but also great app support, and decent battery life. However, it is essentially a rebranded Realme Buds Air 2. The Realme Buds Air 2 and the Dizo GoPods are both priced at ₹3,299. We're not fans of rebranded products because we see no sense in confusing the consumer by providing 2 exact same offerings with different names or price points. We hope we get to see some originality from Dizo in the future, even if they are under Realme's techlife ecosystem.
