METaverse

A week after a mysterious interview with the Verge, Zuckerberg unveiled his vision for how the company would be a major player in the Metaverse, over a call to investors. The metaverse is a hyperconnected virtual reality, that continues your experiences across devices and platforms. Zuckerberg explains it as, "You're going to be able to access the metaverse from all different devices in different levels of fidelity – from apps on phones and PCs to immersive virtual and augmented reality devices. Within the metaverse, you're going to be able to hang out, play games with friends, work, create, and more. You're basically going to be able to do everything that you can on the internet today as well as some things that don't make sense on the internet today, like dancing." Seems like Facebook is looking into what kind of an entity the internet will evolve into next, or it might just be another overhyped, overused buzzword that keep cropping up in tech circles every now and then, such as convergence, or our favorite "the framework". Either way, as far as placing this particular company increasingly in the centers of our existence, experience warns us to be at least a bit wary.

BEANING

Kids in the UK are smearing baked beans on people's homes, vehicles and driveways. The act seems to be more for the benefit of the camera than troubling anyone.. This is just the latest mischievous thing that TikTok users have discovered. The vandals are known as bean bandits or beaners, and are typically teenagers. The police have received alerts of teenage beaners out on the loose, and have sent out alerts warning parents and merchants to watch out for teenagers moving about suspicious quantities of tinned beans. Apparently the beaners have organised into an underground syndicate, known as "the beaning". We are not worried that this is going to catch on in India because of how tasty baked beans
