o, this little feature originally started out with it being called "The most OP aliens from science fiction"

but as any science fiction enthusiast (aka nerd) would tell you, the sheer number of retcons and timelines make it near impossible to find the strongest. To that end, we decided to take the easier way out and tell you a bit about the most interesting aliens from pop culture. We have decided to pick one alien from major franchises and the criteria for making it on the list is uniqueness.

1. REAPERS (MASS EFFECT FRANCHISE)

The main baddie from the Mass Effect franchise, the one that threatened the continued existence of all space fairing species of the galaxy right from the first game and then participated in an all-out assault against the citizens in game three. The Reapers are akin to a force of nature, appearing every 50,000 years to rid the galaxy of all the species that have started using the Mass Relays for interstellar travel. Their main goal though is not mass genocide, as much as it seems like it is. Although their methods are twisted, the Reaper programming simply wants to preserve organic life but since it is an artificial intelligence itself, its preservation code concluded that all species would eventually develop AI that would overthrow and exterminate its masters and go on to rid the universe of all organic life as well. Thus began a never-ending cycle of them appearing every 50,000 years to rid the galaxy of sufficiently advanced species before they were able to create a genocidal AI (ironically, kinda like the Reapers themselves).

2. MOGO (DC)

There is no denying that there are a bunch of aliens that have spawned out of the imaginations of science fiction writers from across the world. Strange abilities, body shapes, varying degrees of technology, and intentions. Most of them though have one thing in common. They originate from either a planet or a planetary object. But, here we have an alien that is a planet itself. Oh yeah, you read that right. A living, breathing (well, maybe not breathing), sentient planet. Not to be confused with a planet that hosts life, which Mogo does as well. And, if a sentient planet weren't unique enough for you, Mogo is also a member of the Green Lantern Corps. Being a planet and having the energy of the same, Mogo is one of the most powerful Green Lanterns with immense scope and intelligence. It is also responsible for the induction of new Green Lantern members as it can detect beings with strong willpower and can direct the rings of the perished Green Lanterns to said beings.

3. ENGINEERS (ALIEN FRANCHISE)

These aliens make it on the list here as within the franchise, they are responsible for the existence of humanity. The Engineers are an ancient race of super-advanced beings who have been around for at least hundreds of millions of years if not billions. They possess superior technology as you would expect and go around seeding planets with their DNA to speed up the evolutionary process which results in races being created in their image. It is said that they have visited the Earth plenty of times which we know thanks to ancient cave paintings of large beings pointing up at a set of stars in the night sky. At some point, they also planned to exterminate humanity for reasons unknown but on the way to Earth, the pathogen they were to use to kill off humanity accidentally got loose on their ship, killing most of the genocidal
