Netflix cracks down on password sharing

Password sharing is extremely common when it comes to streaming services, especially one as exorbitantly priced as Netflix. Sadly, it may soon be chargeable. According to an official announcement, Netflix will be testing out a subscription fee for extra members to address password sharing. Launching this test in three Latin American countries including Chile, Costa Rica and Peru, this is targeted at users who share their Netflix passwords with people outside of their households, which violates Netflix's terms of use. Subscribers of the Standard and

Premium plans will be allowed to add two accounts outside of their household for a fee. These extra members will even get new login credentials. Additionally, if a user has been using a shared password all this time and wants to set up a new Netflix account, they can transfer their profile with all the watch history and recommendations to a brand new account.

The Batman's Paul Dano to write Riddler: Year One comic

After playing Edward Nashton a.k.a. the Riddler in Matt Reeves' The Batman, Paul Dano will now be dipping his toes into the comic world. Dano is reportedly writing the Riddler's origin story in a new comic dubbed "Riddler: Year One". This will be a six-issue Black Label Bimonthly Limited Series and will launch in October 2022. Illustrator Stevan Subic is making his DC Comics debut with these comics. The premise of the comic will be the story of how accountant Edward Nashton went from being a nobody to Batman's nemesis. DC Comics announced the comic book and Dano's writing debut via Twitter and also released a first look image alongside. The teaser image has Riddler's glasses on top of scattered files and papers with the title scribbled across the document. The Batman didn't answer all the questions regarding the villain since he got very little screen time and the comics could give fans more of that Riddler goodness (or badness?).
