Internet's biggest pixel war

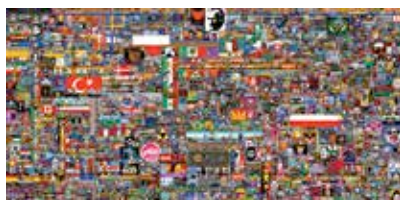

Reddit pits communities against each other

R/PLACE

Started on April Fools 2017, and revitalised once again this year on the first of April, r/place is a social experiment on Reddit where users can collectively create great works of art by tiny individual contributions. Conceived by Josh Wardle, the same person who designed the viral internet phenomenon Wordle, r/place uses a massive canvas, totaling 4 million pixels overall and users can pick one of 32 different colours to place on a single pixel. Once placed and locked in, the user will be unable to place another pixel for 5 minutes. This essentially promotes massive community involvement in trying to create an art piece and promotes a sense of bonding and togetherness in a time when the internet is vastly divided and polarised. Over 4.5 million reddit accounts were collectively involved in the four day event, placing upwards of 72 million pixels, and getting the number of active users on the site to an all-time peak. There were a few major hitches, one of which was "botting", or the involvement of auto generated reddit accounts which placed pixels automatically at fixed pixel coordinates. It ruined the spirit of the project and would often indiscriminately be placed over other existing artwork. Another one was the involvement of live streamers who could mobilise armies of viewers to rapidly generate whatever they want on the canvas. Again, the same principle was violated, and several steamers received criticism for the same, including the popular French Canadian Twitch streamer Félix "xQc" Lengyel. But overall, it was still an incredibly positive experience, firing up netizens like nothing else. A certified Hot.

FORMULA ONE AND PORPOISING

Formula One has gone through an immense rule change for 2022 season, with the idea to promote closer racing and more action packed races in general. However with these rule changes came an unexpected problem, which is the issue of porpoising. So, the new rule changes reduce the reliance of the cars on the complicated bargeboards and the wings on the front and rear to generate down force. Now teams have to rely on an aerodynamic phenomenon called ground effect which basically uses the low pressure that is generated by fast moving air under the floor of the car to suck the car to the ground. Although it is an ingenious way to generate downforce, the side effect is that when the car is nearing the top speed, it is being sucked to the ground so much that there is not enough space for the air to flow anymore and that completely stalls the airflow which can results in the car popping up slightly and that jump starts the ground effect process all over again. To the viewer and the driver, it just feels like the car is being driven on the bumpiest of roads with the whole vehicle bobbing at around 200 mph. Rest assured, it's not a good look for the fastest sport in the world.

PINK FLOYD RELEASED NEW MUSIC

For the first time in almost 29 years, Pink Floyd is to release a new song. This is in an attempt to help Ukraine raise money with the ongoing war between Russia and Ukraine, and will feature a popular Ukrainian vocalist Andriy Khlyvnyuk from the band BoomBox. Titled "Hey Hey Rise Up", Pink Floyd hopes to bring awareness and light to the situation that is the humanitarian crisis in Ukraine, and raise enough money to help protect the innocent Ukrainian civilians who were caught in the crossfire of a political land struggle. The song was released on the 8th of April, and is essentially a complete version of a clip that Andriy had recorded standing in front of Kyiv's St. Sophia Cathedral singing a patriotic Ukrainian song. It was received very well, and with the song up on youtube and spotify. Pink Floyd has confirmed that all earnings from the song will go to the Ukraine Humanitarian Relief Fund. Needless wars being fought over land and resources? Not. A band of legend status releasing new music after 3 decades? Very very hot.
