

THE BEGINNING

As Valorant was released for everyone in the middle of the quarantine back in 2020, we saw the game being called a "CS:GO Clone" or "A weird mixture of CS:GO and Overwatch".

However, in today's date, we get to see Valorant becoming a giant title on its own and instead of people picking up old washed up CS:GO veterans for their Valorant teams, they have started to look for people dedicated to Valorant itself and play specific roles in the game such as a Sentinel, an Initiator or one of those flashy duelist mains which we don't have a lack of.

As the game has separated itself from CS:GO and Overwatch, we are also seeing a new scene being developed around it in India and around the world and it is thanks to Riot's own efforts in regulating the eSports scene for its one and a half year old game.

With the Valorant Challenger's Tour happening every year, almost all year around, it has become a matter of prestige and accomplishments for any and every team that has picked up a roster for the game, be it a bunch of pugstars coming together to pose a challenge, or huge orgs like Liquid or Luminosity coming into the scene and actively trying to do better, everyone wants to do well but it is at the VCT that everyone, and we mean EVERYONE, wants to win. Because the VCT is now considered to be THE flagship event of Valorant.

HOW IT GREW

It didn't take long for competitions to start taking place for the game as we saw JBL coming up with its Quantum Cup and other companies following suit.

The same thing happened in India, Nodwin Gaming came up with its Valorant Agni series which boasted a prize pool of ₹4,25,000 making it one of the pioneers for the Valorant Comp Scene in India.

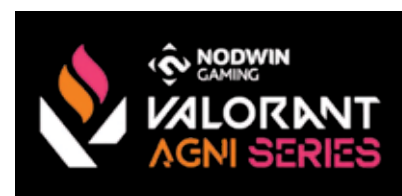

However, Nodwin wouldn't just

An initial image released by Riot as a teaser to what the game looked like.

The Valorant Challengers Tour(VCT)

The Valorant Agni Series Logo by Nodwin Gaming