have gone to Naruto and Sasuke. You would have certainly been wrong with that thought process but we can excuse it since both are pretty close in terms of their iconic-ness. The rivalry between Naruto and Sasuke began early on in the series but they were by no means equals at that point. Unlike Goku and Vegeta, where the former had the upper hand almost all the time, Naruto and Sasuke have had their ups and downs in terms of who was more powerful. Spoiler alert, Sasuke had the upper hand most of the time in Naruto, if you don't count Naruto's tailed beast modes and the same goes for Ship-pudden as well until Naruto mastered Sage Mode after which there really was no looking back. The final battle between the two is much debated as well in terms of who was powerful. While most think their fight ended in a tie, there is a legitimate argument to be made if you consider that Naruto was never trying to kill Sasuke but simply focused on dodging or tanking his hits. Had it been the other way round, the outcome may not have ended in a tie.

ASH VS GARY

The battle of the trainers. Ash and Gary both hail from the same town but Gary seems to have the edge over Ash with pretty much everything. Not only is Gary the son of Professor Oak who is like the sensei for much of the Pokemon anime, but he is also better than Ash when it comes to training Pokemon. Ash did not help himself either when he woke up late and missed out on getting a starter pokemon from Professor Oak and had to get a less than friendly Pikachu instead. As the series progresses, Gary keeps making an appearance from time to time and we get to see just how much better Gary is doing on his journey compared to Ash. Not only does his pokemon collection dwarf Ash's but even his badge collection is far greater than our protagonists. Later on in a tournament, Gary also manages to defeat Ash breaking his winning streak. As if being defeated in a tournament watched by the whole world wasn't bad enough already, Gary also defeated Ash after the former had retired from being a Pokemon trainer. In this particular rivalry, we can certainly see who is doing the chasing and who is the one being chased.

IZUKU MIDORIYA VS KATSUKI BAKUGO

These young rivals are from the show My Hero Academia. Izuku Midoriya and Katsuki Bakugo were friends when they were kids. Well, maybe not friends. You could say that Midoriya idolised Bakugo and his Quirk. When Midoriya found out that he would not have a Quirk of his own he became the subject of ridicule from his former friend, Bakugo. Later on, after Midoriya got a Quirk of his own through some rather "unusual" means, the rivalry between Midoriya and Bakugo intensified when he got into U.A High School, a prestigious school dedicated to the training and education of young future heroes. The rivalry is further flamed when, in a battle exercise, both of them are pitted against each other. As a series, My Hero Academia is still quite young, unlike the other series we have mentioned previously. And as things progress, we are sure to see more sparks fly as these young rivals find their way in the Hero business.

YAGAMI LIGHT VS L

Long time anime watchers will all be familiar with Death Note and the epic battle of wits between the anime's two main characters, the antagonist Yagami Light, and the protagonist L. Since the anime aired, it has been a constant debate about who between the two was smarter, because they were just that well-matched when it came to a battle of wits. It was a battle between whose vision of Justice was right; Light, who believed that criminals should be executed and wanted to, in many ways, play God, and L who believed in the system and believed that no one person should be judge, jury, and executioner. Throughout the series, we're treated to the two of them constantly trying to one-up the other, always trying to be a step ahead. Now, while it could be said that Light had an unfair supernatural advantage, it does not take away from his overall intellectual brilliance and foresight. We can't help but root for L here however, call it personal bias, but he was this close to figuring it all out. This close!
