and origin of Wonder Woman. The valuation probably shot up because of the recent increase in popularity of this already beloved character thanks to the movies that have made her a mainstream household name and the torchbearer of female superheroes. Written by William Moulton Marston and art by H.G. Peter, this 64-page comic was first published in 1940 with a 9.0-grade copy selling at $411,000 in 2016 and a 9.4-grade copy selling at $936,233 in 2019 on eBay.

AMAZING FANTASY #15

($1.1 million)

1962's Amazing Fantasy #15 written by Steve Ditko and Stan Lee is another comic featuring the first appearance of one of our beloved superheroes. Seems to be a trend with these high-value comics eh? As J. Jonah Jameson would put it, this comic brought the "web-slinging menace" a.k.a. Spider-Man into our collective consciousness. In 1962, the comic sold at just 12 cents. Fast forward 49 years and in 2011, a 9.8-graded issue sold at an insane $1.1 million at an auction. Even a 4.0-graded copy of this comic could fetch you a neat $30,000. Considering the other comics we still have on the list that are valued higher, the comic with the first appearance of Spider-Man seems a bit underpriced, but maybe that's just us as huge Spider-Man fanboys and fangirls!

ACTION COMICS #27

($1.5 million)

Born in it. Moulded by it. That's probably something that Bane would have said about Batman and Detective Comics #27. The Dark Knight or the Caped Crusader made his first appearance in Action Comics #27 and in 2010 it ended up being the most expensive book sold that year. In 1939, the comic would have just cost 10 cents and featured a Batman story called "The Case of the Chemical Syndicate". The character was introduced by the now legendary Bob Kane and Bill Finger. Little did they know that over 80 years later, their work is much sought after and a single copy is worth millions. A 7.0-graded copy sold at $1.5 million dollars in 2020, while an 8.0-graded copy sold for $1.07 million back in 2010. What's more, a 2.5-graded copy managed to fetch $410,000 in 2018. Feel like rummaging around in your old storeroom to find some old comics lying around, do you?

($3.2 Million)

So, now we get down to the most expensive comic book of all and it features the debut of the most quintessential and recognisable superhero of all time. Superman was first seen on comic book pages back in 1938's Action Comics #1. Available at that time for a mere 10 cents, this comic book has just risen in value since its debut and it continues to keep rising to this day. Very few copies of this issue remain and those that do are sought after and have even been stolen. Back in 2014, a 9.0-graded copy fetched a whopping $3,207,852 on eBay. A similarly graded copy has an even more fascinating story where an issue of Action Comics #1 that belonged to Nicolas Cage and then was stolen from him and found 11 years later sold for $2.16 million. Widely considered the first true superhero comic, this Jerry Siegel and Joe Shuster creation had the now-iconic cover art with Superman holding up a car. Considering how this comic is the genesis of pretty much all the superheroes we know and love today, it's no wonder that a good enough copy of this issue fetches a fortune.

It probably came as no surprise that the most valued comic books of all time were from the superhero genre. Considering their popularity these days it absolutely makes sense. On the whole iconic comic books do fetch a hefty sum of money and we have some honourable mentions here that didn't quite make the cut. First up we have Walt Disney's Comics and Stories No1 which was first published in 1940 and a 9.4-graded copy sold for a cool $116,513. Then we have the first-ever Archie Comics, uhh comic book that fetched $167,300 in 2012. Currently the most valued superhero team, The Avengers found themselves in comic book pages for the first time in 1963 in the comic called The Avengers whose first issue sold for $274,850. 1
