

Putting People to work

Vivekanand Manjeri,
Brand Director,
Client Solutions Group,
Dell Technologies, India

Getting to know the enterprise laptop market from Dell's perspective

Mithun Mohandas | mithun@digit.in

Dell's latest refresh of their enterprise machines for the year saw some pretty interesting developments and hardware upgrades. We sat down with Vivekanand Manjeri, Brand Director, Client Solutions Group, Dell Technologies, India to understand some of the thought processes behind the new product features and how the enterprise PC industry has fared over the pandemic.

d During the pandemic, a lot of sales moved towards online channels, at least in the consumer market. We wanted to understand if a similar trend was also seen in the enterprise market?

Vivekanand: You know, we believe in an omnichannel approach. So we always were customer backward. So depending upon what the customer desires and provided their processes allow, we offer them all options. So direct channels, online and all the different routes to market are supported at Dell technologies. Now, to your question.

During the pandemic, I think some of our customers, because of ease of, either the purchase journey and having had the maturity to manage buying PCs through online channels requested us for that option, and we enabled it for them. But the big difference between consumer and commercial is that in the consumer market, the demand is aggregated within - I would say - a few mainstream SKUs whereas in the commercial space, every organisation customises the requirement. Therefore, a pure online play in large enterprises is still a little way away. But like I said, whenever our customers have requested for an online buying experience, we have the functionality to enable that.

d You'd mentioned some of the privacy features such as Onlooker Detection and Lookaway Detection on the